2015-06-04T09:10-07 A famous sci-fi author, Larry Niven, has insinuated that Japan and China have bad luck because he has named a planet in his novels—Jinx. It is subtle. A different sci-fi author, Olaf Stapledon, has prophesied the Americanization of the whole planet Earth, Terra.

2015-06-04T10:29-07 I do not dislike English. The language is mainly a bulk of blue Greco-Latin words over a pink Anglo-Saxon substratum of words. Since I have Greco-Latin ancestry, English is not entirely foreign to me. English is like blue and pink candies. It is an interesting language. Since I know the International Phonetic Alphabet or IPA, I know the underlying sound structure hidden by a seemingly chaotic orthography. There are more sounds, phonemes, in English than the 26-letter Latin alphabet can accommodate, so without the use of accents, there is a bit of chaos in spelling.

2015-06-04T13:17-07 Religion is just art. However, I do enjoy comparing religions to learn about different perspectives. I like Buddhism a lot, but Dào comes next. Dào is Animism. In essence, though, it would be better to promote Science than Religion, which is just art. Science is everlasting, a self-correcting paradigm, which is really different from Religion. Religion is just art.

2015-06-04T16:05-07 Gravities on other worlds, be they moons or planets, differ. If a person were born and raised in lighter gravity, he or she would need limb support on an Earth visit. A person born and raised in heavier gravity would be stockier in build.

2015-06-04T16:09-07 Work ethic depends on culture. In some Eastern cultures, repetitive work is seen as a chance for meditation. In some Western cultures, work has lost the feeling of natural rhythm and people feel disillusioned. Work that one likes becomes harder to find. Few find pleasure in work. Those few are lucky.
