

20191021 English Evolution

Viktor Nonong Medrano

During my academic interests about languages, I have encountered English creoles like Suriname's Sranan and Papua New Guinea's Tok Pisin. These creoles have made me think that English will not always be English. English will evolve. But perhaps a stagnant form of English as Old Latin is today will exist as some kind of archaic standard non-vernacular language, maybe only in written form, in some parts of this world. In Edgar Pangborn's Davy, he describes a future post-apocalyptic medieval-like world. There, people then refer to our present-day English as "Old-Time style." Languages always change as people change.
